Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank and College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board

Introduction

In 1988 Marion Chew sued the State of California for infringing her patented method of testing automobile emissions.\(^1\) The district court dismissed Chew’s suit at the threshold, holding that the Eleventh Amendment barred it from hearing a patent infringement action against a state.\(^2\) On appeal, the Federal Circuit held that the Patent Act\(^3\) did not abrogate the states’ Eleventh Amendment immunity because it did not contain a clear statement of Congress’ intention to abrogate\(^4\) as required by the Supreme Court’s holding in Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon.\(^5\)

In response to Chew, Congress passed a series of acts, the Remedy Acts, clarifying its intention to abrogate state sovereign immunity from suits involving intellectual property rights.\(^6\)

Following passage of the Remedy Acts, lower courts split over the validity of Congress’s attempts to abrogate state sovereign immunity.\(^7\) In Florida Prepaid v. College Savings Bank\(^8\)

\(^{5}\) 473 U.S. 234 (1985). Atascadero held that to abrogate Eleventh Amendment immunity, Congress must “mak[e] its intention unmistakably clear in the language of the statute.” Id. at 242.

\(^{6}\) The Patent Remedy Act amended the Patent Act so that “[a]ny State, and any such instrumentality, officer, or employee, shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.” 35 U.S.C. § 271(h) (1992). Section 296(a) further states that a state “shall not be immune, under the eleventh amendment … or under any other doctrine of sovereign immunity, from suit in Federal court by any person … for infringement of a patent ….” Id. at § 296(a). The Trademark Clarification Remedy Act (TCRA), amended the Lanham Act by specifying that the states “shall not be immune, under the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States or under any other doctrine of sovereign immunity, from suit in Federal court by any person … for any violation under this chapter.” 15 U.S.C. § 1122 (b) (1992). The Copyright Remedy Act similarly stated Congress’ intent to render states amenable to suit for copyright infringement. See 17 U.S.C. § 511 (1990).

and College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid, the Supreme Court confronted the Patent and Trademark Remedy Acts head-on, and held them to be unconstitutional attempts to abrogate state sovereign immunity.

In many respects the two opinions flow naturally from Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, which held that Congress may not abrogate state sovereign immunity when legislating pursuant to its Article I power to regulate commerce. The logic of Seminole Tribe applies to all of Congress’s Article I powers, including those of the Patent Clause. However, Florida Prepaid and College Savings Bank find the Court once again wielding its Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence in the service of state’s rights by constricting congressional flexibility in an area previously subject to strict federal oversight.

To reach its holdings, the Court overruled the constructive waiver doctrine of Parden v. Terminal Railway and narrowed Congress’s ability to legislate under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The decisions weaken the integrity of the intellectual property system, allow states to deprive patentees of their property without due process of law, and ignore the functional reality of state involvement in the intellectual property system.
